

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This thesis grew out of a series of dialogues with my supervisor Professor Gordon White. Through his Socratic questioning, Gordon brought me closer to the reality I had initially perceived, eventually enabling me to grasp its rich complexity. His comments on chapter drafts are themselves a course in critical thought upon which I will always draw. His capacity to combine critique with an immediate empathy and commitment towards workers and others engaged in struggle will always inspire me. Gordon was at the centre of our friendships at IDS, turning water into wine with his music, quick wit and incredible imagination. Amid the laughter and chapter drafts, Gordon was always there to offer quiet encouragement, at times embarrassed by his own extraordinary kindness.

I am very grateful for my years at the Institute of Development Studies, made possible by the Overseas Research Students Awards Scheme, Development Support Fund, and the steadfast support of my family.

I am also indebted to Professor Raphie Kaplinsky and the Industrial Group at IDS whose work inspired me to examine productive adaptation and industrial relations in Nicaragua. Raphie's firm belief that a better way can always be found has influenced my approach to this research, as well as to daily life. His advice on interpreting the case study results and productive comments on an earlier draft directly contributed to this study, while his friendship, always refreshing, enhanced the DPhil experience.

While working as chief economic adviser, Professor Valpy FitzGerald became teacher and friend to many in Nicaragua, engaging us in a perpetual dialogue with daily events. His insights into the Nicaraguan experience enriched this research. Nevertheless, he cannot be credited for the numerous references to FitzGerald as he recommended several other articles, leaving me to discover the unique relevance of his own work.

Many thanks to Judy Butler and Julie McWilliam whose editing suggestions and precise sense of language contributed to the final copy. Julie provided decisive and energetic support during the write-up stage, clearing the path towards thesis completion in her solution-oriented way. The loyal assistance of Walkiria Soto, Patricia Campbell, Carly Gray, and especially Noemi Albuquerque, enabled me to bypass the more persistent obstacles to thesis completion. Also thanks to Carrie Parker for her assistance and willingness to discuss ideas at their initial stage.

The author alone assumes responsibility for the conclusions of this thesis and any errors it may contain.

Many thanks to the staff at IDS whose friendship and support have made it more than a temporary place of study for students and alumni from around the world. I would especially like to thank Sheila Burgess for her morning greetings mixed with advice and a sense of humour about life, Sue Ong for her fighting spirit, Charlie Morphy for his accordion performances of 'Moon River', and the Greenfield family for their warm welcome upon each return to IDS.

This thesis gradually emerged amid the friendships that animated my IDS years and provided their most lasting lessons. My South African friends kindled a spirit of optimism as they initiated a new era in their country. Many thanks to Ketso and Roshene Gordhan, Moses Ngoasheng, Zav Rustomjee, Claudia Manning, Faizel Ismail and the Kaplinsky family who together showed me how generosity flows so naturally from a sense of being blessed.

Mammo Muchie provided valuable feedback at both the initial and closing moments of this thesis, conveying an Ethiopian sense of continuity. Shin-Yuan Lai, Annie Posthuma, and Judit Kiss offered constant support amid talk of politics, poetry and chapter drafts. I was privileged to share both the Nicaraguan revolution and IDS days with Betty Muñoz, Terry and Julio Hernández, Arturo Grigsby, and Steve Grun and Amanda Lorio, who provided steady encouragement during the write-up stage. Special thanks to Rodolfo Pedrozo for persuading me to pursue postgraduate studies.

In Nicaragua, this research was possible due to the support of the Ministry of Industry, main metalworking firms, national labour federations and enterprise unions. I am grateful for having had the opportunity to carry out this research from within the corporation of state-owned enterprises. It is impossible to reference the knowledge and insights gained from ongoing conversations with its engineers, planners, administrators and enterprise directors, especially Ronaldo Bermúdez, former director of the metalworking division, Wilibald Friedersdorf, Irma Jarquín, Herzan García, and Julio Valladares. Likewise, Carlos Borge supported this study from its first days, while Comandante Victor Tirado provided perceptive comments on its findings.

This study drew upon the knowledge and experience of managers, labour activists, engineers and other employees in the main metalworking firms, particularly IMEP and METASA. Although too numerous to name, they are appreciated for their individual contributions. This research benefited particularly from the receptivity of workers, who shared their recent history with me in a variety of settings. Many thanks to all, especially Julia Vasquez and Mario Blass who always remember to bring me news of everyone.

I am grateful to the many Nicaraguans who over several years have welcomed me into their homes, offices, schools and factories as journalist, researcher and friend. The understanding gained through these encounters and subsequent friendships formed the vital background to this more narrowly-focused study. In many ways, the latter is the outcome of a learning process initially made possible by a cherished Thomas J. Watson Fellowship. Also special thanks to Charles Merrill for the poetry books and encouragement.

I especially remember today three who marked the way: Marcel Pallais who initiated this story; Miguel Castillo, the child who greeted me at the door on my first day of work in the revolution; Father César Jerez S. J. who indicated a way forward, and so many others still sorely missed in Nicaragua.

From my first days in Nicaragua, Kay Stubbs, Reynaldo Diaz, Fabienne Marsh and Desiree Pallais have shared so many special moments, contributing to a common story whose colourful pages now lead me towards a new chapter. The warm support of all my friends in Nicaragua enabled me to complete this thesis and have a wonderful time along the way. I wish I could mention each individually, but will throw a large party instead. An early invitation goes to my neighbour Flor de Maria Escobar and the Thursday coffee group.

I am forever grateful to my grandparents, May and David Carswell, and Alice and Hugh Sullivan, whose foresight and values paved the way for a privileged education, and to my parents Ann and Brian who gently offer counsel and unconditional support at each turn of the road.

This thesis is dedicated to Brian and Ann Sullivan. The creativity, determination and sense of joy with which they respond to life's challenges has led me to seek this in others. Life blessed me with the opportunity to meet Professor Gordon White. This thesis is a small tribute to an exceptional man from a student still anxious to learn from him.
